

CONVENTS IN KRAKÓW IN THE 20TH CENTURY

Justyna Liro

Abstract: Religious orders are clearly noticeable in the geographic space of major cities in Poland. The purpose of the paper is to analyse the location factors for religious orders in Kraków, including the location of the most important houses and their related activity in the city. Religious orders have been present in Kraków since its beginnings. The paper covers convents run by the Roman Catholic Church within the borders of Kraków. The paper is focused on the 20th century when a considerable increase of the number of religious orders and general spatial development of the city was observed. The data for this paper was obtained from church and secular sources, as well as land surveys. In addition, changes in the spatial distribution of religious orders and monastic houses operating in Kraków in the 20th century as well as modifications in their functions were analysed. The largest concentration of monastic houses is Kraków's historic core. The actual distribution of convents is a result of centuries-old traditions and depends on numerous factors such as the capital city function of Kraków in effect until the end of the 16th century and the rank of religious administration (bishopric). A further increase in the number of monastic houses was also due to the spatial growth of the city and the general development of monastic life. Religious orders were characterised by various endogenous and exogenous functions.

Keywords: convent, monastic house, urban space, Kraków

Introduction

Religious orders are clearly visible in the geographic space of a city and perform different social and religious functions. From the early beginnings of cities, convents have performed endogenous and exogenous functions, both for city residents and people living outside of its area. The seats of religious orders change the nature of urban space, endowing it with a sacred dimension. The location of monastic houses has had varied purposes. Historically, in addition to ministry to its residents, convents have also provided religious benefits to the faithful including safety. Thus far, geographical research has focused on the general characteristics of monastic houses operating in the city of Gdynia (Przybylska 2003a, 2003b). However, there have been neither studies on the distribution of religious orders in other cities nor studies analysing their functioning in spatial and temporal terms. In article terms religious order and convent mean a community of religious sisters or nuns. Monastic house is a seat, building used by community.

Kraków is a unique city in terms of the number of religious orders. Due to its history and its political and religious functions, the city is still one of the most important centres of monastic life in Poland. Kraków was founded before the 9th century and was officially granted city status in 1257. From the year 1,000 it has been the seat of the Kraków Diocese and since 1925 it has been the seat of the Kraków Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church. For more than six centuries Kraków was also the capital of Poland and this fact, together with one of the most important seats of the Roman Catholic Church administration, served as two basic factors for the development of monastic life and the growth of the number of religious orders in the city. The data used in the paper was obtained from church and secular sources as well as land surveys. The analysis in the paper includes all convents of the Roman Catholic Church within the contemporary boundaries of the city of Kraków.

The purpose of the paper was to identify the factors behind religious orders and monastic house location, and forms of convent activity in Kraków. The paper is focused on the 20th century, which was very important for the development of monastic life in Kraków due to a high rate of growth in the number of monastic houses. The effects of other factors on the development of monastic life in Kraków were also considered.

Brief history of religious orders in Kraków till the end of the 19th century

Religious orders have been present in the city since its beginnings. The Order of the Norbertines was the first to establish a convent in 1162 (Table 1). At first, this religious order was situated outside of city limits. The founder of this monastic house, the heir of Zwierzyniec, had influenced its location near the crossing over the Vistula River. Being situated far from the city, this religious order was exposed to foreign invasions, so walls around the convent were built. Its location at the confluence of the Vistula and Rudawa rivers resulted in the building of a mill for the Order and to meet the needs of the local population until the 16th century. In the 13th century, two houses of the Sisters Canonesses of the Holy Spirit de Saxia were built in the city centre. Their location within city walls was determined by the convent's activity, i.e. work at the Kraków hospital. In the 14th century, the convent of the Sisters of Saint Clare was founded in the city centre near the Church of St. Andrew the Apostle. This along with the adjoining monastic house, also had a defensive aspect. The Convent of the Sisters of Saint Claire was founded by the Blessed Salome and it originally also operated a hospital, but later the nuns initiated educational programs targeting young upper class girls. In the 15th century, the Convent of the Bernardine Sisters was also established in the Kraków city core. To protect itself from invasions and natural disasters such as floods, it was also located inside the city walls, and was a contemplative-type convent. The locations of the convents of the Sisters of Saint Claire and the Bernardine Sisters were selected by their founders.

In the 16th century, the first convent of the Augustinian Sisters was established in Kazimierz, a city adjacent to Kraków (1336 to 1915). The choice of this location near the Church of St. Catherine was made by King Stefan Batory. In the 17th century, more new religious orders were established in the Kraków centre: Sisters of the Presentation, Visitation Sisters, and two currently closed convents of the Carmelite Sisters and the Cloistered Dominican Sisters (Table 1). The Sisters of the Presentation were established in Kraków as the first Polish non-contemplative order. From the very beginning, these nuns dealt with educational and pedagogical issues. The Sisters of the Visitation, moved to Kraków from Warsaw, have also conducted this type of work. The foundation of these two convents inside the city walls resulted from the work pursued by them. The establishment of the Carmelite Sisters and the Cloistered Dominican Sisters was a due to a decision by the founders and donors of land. The 18th century was a period of stagnation in Kraków, not only in terms of the number of new religious orders, but also in terms of the general development of the city.

In the 19th century, another 9 convents and 35 monastic houses were founded, but mainly outside of the city's historic core. This was the result of the spatial development of Kraków. Most of the new sites were located in Łobzów, Podgórze, and Łagiewniki (Table 1.), which were new settlement areas added to the city during the 19th century.

Convents and monastic houses in the 20th century

Locations

In 1900, there were 19 convents in 49 monastic houses, which were concentrated in the city's historic core and its vicinity; others were located outside of it, i.e. the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy at Łagiewniki. The vast majority of monastic houses located in the Medieval part of town have a long tradition. In the first half of the 20th century, 32 new monastic houses were established in Kraków, mainly outside of the historic core. In the second half of the 20th century, there was visible growth in the number of houses outside the old city core – in newly developing districts including the new industrial district of Nowa Huta. In the year 2000, 48 convents located in Kraków occupied 118 monastic houses (Fig. 1, Annex 1). There was a considerable increase in the number of new monastic houses in new districts of Kraków. The greatest increase was observed in the Old Town and its vicinity. The spatial development of Kraków was driven by the incorporation of Nowa Huta into Kraków in 1951 and that of Łagiewniki (incorporated in 1941) with its Sanctuary of Divine Mercy (Table 2). In Nowa Huta, new orders were founded in new parishes, and at Łagiewniki in the vicinity of the existing Congregation of the Sisters of Mercy. In the 20th century, the number of religious orders and monastic houses in Kraków had doubled. The increase in the number of monastic houses in Kraków in the 20th century was continuous. Most were founded in the years 1946–1956, and then after 1989. The increase in the 1990s was the result of changes in the political situation in Poland and the resulting lack of limits on the number of new monastic houses.

Both urban development and the foundation of new religious orders in new districts found at an increasing distance from the city centre have been observed in Kraków. During the 19th and 20th centuries, both periods of rapid spatial growth of the city (Fig. 1), the number of new convents located outside the city centre increased considerably. These were new seats of existing orders located in Kraków, as well as new convents founding their first houses. A number of older religious orders, which had been located beyond city limits, were also incorporated into Kraków when the city's boundaries were expanded.

The 20th century was marked by a constant and high number of monastic houses in the city centre and its immediate surroundings, and by numerous new locations in towns and villages incorporated into Kraków during this period of time (Table 2). The city performed many important functions in the 20th century including the hosting of an important Roman Catholic archbishopric. However, monastic life had already functioned in the city for several centuries.

New areas incorporated into Kraków including Łagiewniki, Nowa Huta, and Bronowice grew in population rapidly. Thus, new monastic houses were established at new parishes and new schools (Table 3). In the transition period after 1989, church accessibility also increased. On the eve of the 21st century, the development of monastic life in Kraków continued rapidly. In the period 2001–2003, three new orders were established in the outlying parts of Kraków.

Work activity

Convents play an important role in the religious and social life of Kraków. Their work results mainly from the charism of each given religious order. Among the various types of work performed by religious orders, endogenous and exogenous types of activity should be distinguished. For example, administrative activity is a type of endogenous activity, when a given house is a general house or a provincial house. An example of exogenous educational activity is a situation, when a convents runs a school or dormitory. The same concerns a charity, protective and childcare institutions and pastoral centres (Table 4).

In 1900 most religious houses operated schools or performed pastoral work. In 2000 the activity structure was nearly the same (Fig. 2). In 1900 endogenous administrative activity included management in the case of 8 monastic houses, while in 2000 the number was 17 (Fig. 3). This function is due to the presence of a bishopric in Kraków. In 2000, ten general convents operated in Kraków. Five had been founded in the 20th century. All of the religious orders founded in Kraków have their general seats in the city, while 7 monastic houses, founded in the 19th and 20th centuries, performed the functions of provincial seats. Most general monastic houses have their seats in the historic centre of Kraków. In 1900 nine monastic houses pursued charitable activity, mainly outside the Kraków historic core, while in 2000 there were 17 monastic houses in all of Kraków (Fig. 4). All monastic houses pursuing charitable work were founded in the 19th and 20th centuries. Both in 1900 and 2000 monastic houses performing charitable work tended to be located in the city centre.

In 1900 pastoral work was pursued by 15 monastic houses, mainly in city centre parishes. Thanks to the rapid spatial development of the city, in 2000 there were 53 monastic houses pursuing pastoral work throughout the city (Fig. 5). The new monastic houses established in outlying parishes are located mainly in new housing areas such as Nowa Huta, which were built in the middle of the 20th century.

A similar tendency depicts the educational system of convents. In 1900 there were 19 monastic houses in the city centre pursuing educational work, while in 2000 their number reached 37 virtually across the entire city (Fig. 6). A similar relationship, as in the case of ministry, concerned educational activity. Monastic houses running schools were frequently founded in the 20th century in the most populated new areas of Kraków. A high density is still observed in the historic core; however, some are found in outlying areas.

In 1900 there were 4 monastic houses leading institutions caring for local residents; there were 6 such houses in 2000 (Fig. 7). Childcare institutions were administered by 3 monastic houses in 1900 found outside of city limits i.e. the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy convent at Łagiewniki. In 2000 there were 5 such institutions found outside the city centre (Fig. 7). For monastic houses running a childcare institution or other institution providing care, there was a trend to choose a location outside of the city centre both in 1900 and 2000. Perhaps this was due to a shortage of space in the historic core or the high prices of plots there.

The activity of monastic houses is the result of their charism (Table 5). Sometimes, their location affects their type of activity. Most monastic houses engaged in ministry, i.e. in parishes, are located in the most populated areas of Kraków.

A similar trend concerns those engaged in educational activity. As a result of their status, monastic houses functioning as general and provincial centres tend to be located in the historic city centre. Monastic houses performing charitable work, running care-related institutions, and educational institutions are usually located farther away from the historic core.

For centuries Kraków has served as an important religious centre as well as a centre of monastic life. Six convents were founded here, and it was in Kraków that they had their first seats (Annex 1). As a given convent expanded, seats in other cities and countries were established, and today they are known throughout the world. Kraków is also famous for saints and blessed women coming from religious orders (Table 6). The increasing number of worshippers has driven pilgrimage traffic to places related to saints and the blessed. The best example is the Shrine of the Divine Mercy in Kraków, a place associated with the devotion to St. Faustina Kowalska of the Congregation of the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy located in the Łagiewniki section of the city. In the case of places related to blessed persons, worship and pilgrimage traffic is still minor at this point in time.

Conclusions

Kraków has for centuries served as an important centre of monastic life. In the 20th century, in particular, the number of religious orders in the city increased. In 1900 there were 19 convents in the city operating in 49 monastic houses. On the eve of the 21st century, there were 48 convents in Kraków operating in 118 monastic houses. Most monastic houses founded before the year 1800 are located in the historic core of this city. Later locations found outside of the city centre were usually due to the spatial development of Kraków. New monastic houses were established as new neighbourhoods were being built. The large number of monastic houses in Kraków is due to the considerable status of the city, its former function of capital city of Poland, and its status as a bishopric. As the city grew and the number of convents increased, so did the number of exogenous and endogenous functions in the historic core and outside of it after the year 1900.

The present-day spatial distribution of religious orders in Kraków reflects a heritage of old traditions. The location of convents depended on numerous factors such as the capital city functions performed by Kraków until the end of the 16th century and those connected with its religious administration (bishopric). The locations where new religious orders were established also depended on the exact nature of their work.
